TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON MAGAZINE.

SIR,—You will oblige me by inserting two or three little corrections, relating to the article which appeared in your July number, concerning Mr. JOHN DUNN HUNTER.

Page 317. For "Immediately on his arrival in London, chance directed me to the same house in which he lodged," read "chance directed him to the same house in which I lodged."

Page 318. For "probable" read "palpable;" for "sat" read "sit;" and page 322, for "eminence" read "consequence."

The two first blunders are undoubtedly mine; and though not material to my case, are worth correcting, as they have been rather seriously complained of: the three latter, I believe, are not mine; for although I saw the proof, I saw it without seeing the copy.

The two first originated in this way. After I had made the extracts which I thought necessary, from the pamphlet of our author, I marked those which appeared faulty, for particular animadversion. But when I came to copy them, I was led astray, I perceive, by my notes; and as I had given away the pamphlet before I saw the proof, I had no opportunity of comparing them. I intended to charge Mr. N. with a mistake, in saying that chance brought Mr. J. D. H. to the house in which he (Mr. J. N.) lodged—because I believe that Mr. N. did not arrive in town till after Mr. J. D. H. was established in the house, where Mr. N. afterwards met him. But instead of charging him with that mistake, I charged him with another—or, more properly, with that, in another shape. However this may be, it is a matter of no consequence, except so far as a reputation for exactness may be at stake.

J. N.
